00:01:16	Soundbite by Dominique Ristori (in ENGLISH): This will be important in a single location to have the opportunity to present the scientific and technicol support that JRC provides to European Union priorities and policies and communicating science is vital because at the end of the day all of this work has to be seen as profitable for the world society. As you will see, this Visitors' Centre has been prepared through the concept from micro to macro starting with nano materials and finishing with global challenging	00:00:44
00:02:00	Soundbite by Máire Geoghegan-Quinn (in ENGLISH): Europe, I believe needs much more young scientific talent if we are going to boost our economies, if we are going to tackle issues like climate change, public health and energy, Europe needs one million new researchers by 2020 so encouraging young talent, girls and boys, is a must. And I think that when you meet our enthusiastic team of experts today, I think you will agree that science is no longer about old man in white coats.	00:00:33
