Europe is surrounded by oceans and seas. The EU has some 70 000 km of coastline. Almost half of all EU citizens live within 50 km of the sea and almost 40% of the EU's GDP is generated in the maritime regions. In its proposals for a major reform of the EU Common Fisheries Policy (CFP), the European Commission has set out a radical approach to fisheries management in Europe. The plans aim at securing both fish stocks and fishermen's livelihood for the future while putting an end to overfishing and depletion of fish stocks. The reform will introduce a decentralised approach to science-based fisheries management by region and sea basin, and introduce better governance standards in the EU and on the international level through sustainable fisheries agreements. This new package is being submitted to the European Parliament and Council for adoption under the ordinary legislative procedure (co-decision). The Commission aims for adoption and entry into force of the new framework by 1 January 2013.

The site is used to support a Scottish government- funded Knowledge Transfer Partnership Project conducting research on the use and efficacy of the species Ballan wrasse (Labrus bergylta) as a biological control for sea lice. This is a very topical area of research in European aquaculture given that cost of the damage to the UK fishing industry, caused by sea lice alone, has been estimated at £30 million each year.	00:00:24
