This video stockshot on fisheries in the Mediterranean Sea includes footage of the following: - Fishermen's lives - Greece and Italy; - Fishing ports - Cyprus, Greece, Italy and Spain; - Aquaculture - Cyprus and Greece; - Fish Auctions and Markets - Cyprus, Greece, Italy and Spain; - Fish restaurants - Cyprus and Spain; - Ancillary activities - Greece and Spain. Europe is surrounded by oceans and seas. The EU has some 70 000 km of coastline. Almost half of all EU citizens live within 50 km of the sea and almost 40% of the EU's GDP is generated in the maritime regions. Fisheries in the Mediterranean Sea are mostly characterised by small scale vessels (less than 12 m), carrying out multi-species and multi-gear activities, as well as by the multiplicity of landing points. As the majority of its waters fall under international jurisdiction, cooperation is important among both EU and non-EU coastal countries.

00:00:18	Title In the context of the regional Sicilian economy, fisheries and aquaculture represent 0.58% of the total economy. In terms of processing, Sicily has the largest number of companies dealing with fish conservation in Italy (32%), and the highest number of jobs in this field (27%). The Sicilian fishing fleet currently comprises 3323 vessels and represents by far the largest regional fleet in Italy. Most of the boats use set longlines, purse seines and bottom otter trawls. 55% of the gross tonnage of the Sicilian fleet are specialized vessels and includes mainly bottom otter trawlers and set gill-nets.	00:00:05

00:11:29	Night shot: lights of the port of MazàraMazàra del Vallo, located 100 km south from Palermo, on the Western coast of Sicily, is the main Italian fishing port in terms of tonnage, as well as the most important landing point in Italy. Around 3000 fishermen continue to go to sea. Half of the crewmen are Tunisian. Mazàra has a 3000 strong Tunisian community. The stock shots focus on a medium-sized Sicilian trawler, the 'Prassitele' (49,8 gross tonnage, 22 m long) and its 7 crewmen, while going to sea for their usual 6 days fishing-campaign in the Strait of Sicily and off the Cap Bon, in Tunisia. More than 60% of Sicilian catches are fished in GSA 16, the Strait of Sicily (Canale di Sicilia), a 145 km wide channel that divides the Tyrrhenian Sea and the western Mediterranean Sea from the eastern Mediterranean. Mazàra hosts the most recent fleet, with 30% of all Sicily new vessels built in 2010. But in the same period, between November 2010 and November 2011, 20 vessels where scrapped under EU funded programmes for fishing vessels demolition.	00:00:06

00:13:19	2. Fishermen's Lives - Greece	00:06:41
00:13:19	Title Scene takes place in Angelochori sea village, near Nea Michaniona, Northern Greece. The importance of the fisheries in Greece is more than its contribution to the country's GDP. It plays an important role in preserving the economic and social well-being of many coastal and island communities. Sea Fisheries: In 2011 the Greek professional fishing fleet, according to the European Union Fishing Fleet Register, consisted of 16,696 vessels. Hellenic fishing vessels are not part of an industrialized fleet. The vast majority of them are characteristic of small-scale fishery. There are about 1000 vessels (trawlers and purse seiners) that are efficient and are the main source of suppliers of fresh fisheries products to consumers and to processing industry.	00:00:05

00:20:00	TitleThe most important landing place of Cyprus is the harbour of Limassol, followed by the Pafos port. Important fishing shelters are Larnaca, Latchi, Paralimni and Peyia.The Inshore Fishery is practiced with small wooden boats of 6 to 12 m length overall (O.A.L), which mainly fish with bottom set nets and long lines (passive gears) and fish traps. In 2003, 677 persons were occupied as full time fishermen in 500 licensed boats. The Trawl Fishery	00:00:05 polyvalent vessels fish with nets and bottom long lines but periodically also with surface long lines, fishing for swordfish/tuna. In 2003, 105 fishermen were fully occupied in 38 boats licensed for multipurpose fishing.
