

Public consultation - Update for units of measurement directive

Subject : The 2009 Directive

I think that the directive should be as strict as it can be; A world with only one measurement system can only be a better world. Why should the EU, then, modify the directive?

The United States made a commitment to adopt the metric system a long, long time ago.

If everybody else in the world made the conversion, then, why should the United States be exempted?

If the United States does not want to switch, then, they are the ones putting up a barrier to trade. Some people in the United States, like me, have our hopes that this directive will pressure our government to complete the switch. We know that metrication can be implemented quickly and without any problems.

Please don't destroy the directive. . . it has happened three times already. Thanks.
