

It's a fact already that the big players can afford the high end servers and bandwidth capacity to provide a fast premium service. This is in contrast to most smaller sites, many run from home servers that have neither the capital for marketing or high bandwidth packages. Net neutrality is a farce set up to fast track the internet into a sanitised "Sky TV" type series of models that people have a choice to subscribe too. This will tear apart the very foundation and rip the backbone from the internet, something that many vested interests want very much to see. We, The Internet, do not wish to see this and will fight it every step of the way.

Essential services such as hospitals have the capacity and finance to buy their own dedicated lines if it comes to that, so it's not a matter of bottle-necking such things. Many ISPs already traffic shape, particularly around peak hours so how exactly is expanding this beyond the scale of the ISPs involved can help is difficult if not impossible to see or support.

Yes, the internet is chaos and Government is afraid of it due to the easy freedom of information available worldwide. Take us on at your peril. We love what we have and we will fight to ensure we keep it and keep it expanding.
