Get Smart: Commission brings “open planning” movement to Europe to speed spread of smart cities

The European Commission is calling on those involved in creating smart cities to publish their efforts in order to help build an open planning movement from the ground up. The challenge is being issued to city administrations, small and large companies and other organisations to go public with their ICT, energy and mobility plans, so that all parties can learn from each other and grow the smart city market. Through collaboration as well as traditional competition, the Europe will get smarter, more competitive and more sustainable.
