0 Explanation

Appearing as a very heterogeneous industry, it must be stated that there is no formal structure available which classifies marine supply into dedicated categories. All parties which try to find a suitable categorisation find different solutions which serve more or less their own interests. Therefore, all information about marine equipment and materials provided for example by national associations, classification societies trade fairs etc. is structured differently and therefore difficult to compare. Names of products and services are chosen differently, higher aggregated groupings are assembled differently and also the assignment of individual companies may be seen differently by the interested parties.

Therefore, this study proposes a harmonised structure which is basically following the functional or system oriented view of the customers (shipyards, owners). With some amendments and aggregations especially for materials and the different areas of subcontracting a total of 19 system groups including 69 subgroups for equipment, 10 subgroups for materials and 16 subgroups for subcontracting have been identified.

It has to be admitted that this already quite complex structure may not cover all possible aspects of maritime systems. Especially those for offshore operation (production, processing, drilling, exploration etc.) may not be sufficiently mapped. This structure shows on the one hand the complexity of maritime systems and components and on the other hand provides an access point to evaluate which industry sectors are involved in maritime supplies. It also means that this structure allows a mapping into the systematic statistical systems, which at least allows to identify those statistical industry categories containing maritime supplies. The statistical classification system in use in Europe is called the "General Industrial Classification of Economic Activities within the European Communities" (NACE). This system was in use as version NACE 1.1. until 2007/2008. From then on a revised NACE 2.0. is in use, which, unfortunately, applies a slightly different classification key. Following that, statistical data for the transition year 2008 show still some inconsistencies which are under discussion between the authors and Eurostat.

As a result from this study we provide in addition to the above described and identified system groups for shipbuilding and maritime industries an assignment to the classification system NACE 1.1. and NACE 2.0. It provides a logical link between the system groups and subgroups in the defined structure for the marine supplies industry and the NACE definition. This structure and NACE assignment of the industry makes it better possible to analyse the industrial sector and allows using statistical data of companies and industrial sectors available for these different NACE classes from national or European databases for analysis at least on higher aggregation levels.
