So many people depend on fish for their livelihoods. EU SFPAs (Sustainable Fisheries Partnership Agreements) help to ensure that fish stocks are managed sustainably, promoting the well-being of coastal communities and contributing to food security, jobs and development. I work for my country. I want our fishermen to make a decent living. I don't want fish to be a source of conflict. I want to support local people and their communities. For SFPAs, the partner countries to the EU are a model of good governance and transparent management of fisheries. The agreements are concluded bilaterally. The external parties are third countries and are coherent with EU action. The clock-work of the SFPAs is the EU's responsibility to the partner countries, but the agreements are negotiated to their satisfaction. The benefits for the EU are a regular supply of fish to EU markets. The benefits for the partner countries are access to EU markets, sustainable fishing, taking into account their national and local conditions, support to their national and regional fisheries sector and to the economic development of the partner countries. The agreements are concluded bilaterally. The external parties are third countries and are consistent with the EU action. The clock-work of the SFPAs is the responsibility of the EU to the partner countries, but the agreements are negotiated to their satisfaction. The benefits for the EU are a regular supply of fish to EU markets. The benefits for the partner countries are access to EU markets, sustainable fishing, taking into account their national and local conditions, support to their national and regional fisheries sector and to the economic development of the partner countries.