Urban(eat)a: Turning urban waste into delicious food in Spain

In a nutshell

In Barcelona, a project called Urban(eat)a empowers citizens to harvest edible fruits from urban trees, collaborating with local governments and community groups. Gleaning events and transformation of fruits into products like marmalade and olive oil, not only contribute to alleviating food waste by making use of unwanted food, but also foster community engagement and sustainable practices.

OBJECTIVES

- Promote a paradigm shift from decorative to edible public trees.
- Raise citizen's awareness on food waste and engagement.

ACTIONS

- Identify edible food sites and products.
- Execute gleaning; transfer produce, transform and deliver to partners.
- Coordinate with local, associations and charities.
