OUR IMPACT

Narmine is a 30-year-old Lebanese woman. She is single and lives with her mom and brother in a remote village in Central Bekaa. She takes care of her sick mom and of the daily work.

Narmine was suffering from social isolation. Her family restricted her from leaving her home, she had no friends and no interaction with anyone.

Qudra's partner, ABAAD Lebanon - Resource Centre for Gender Equality, organises regular home visits to the villagers. They explain about their activities and invite them to participate. This is how Narmine learned about the training course provided for women at the Social Development Centers (SDC).

Through her participation in a course, she learned about presenting trays and making chocolate arrangements for events.

Fatima Mari arrived in Jordan after fleeing the war that took her husband and ravaged Homs, her hometown in Syria. Mari is now a single mother raising a seven-year-old daughter. Finding a source of income is a challenge for her.

Through neighbours, she heard of training courses in plumbing. She participated in the course for two months. At the end of the training, she gained her certificate and applied for a work permit in Jordan. She gained enough skills and confidence to start working as a plumber. She goes from home to home with her toolbox, fixing leaks.

Araz is one of the 450 beneficiaries who managed to establish or expand their own businesses with the support of the Qudra Programme in the Kurdistan Region of Iraq.

Araz had a small shop to tailor "swing," the traditional Kurdish and Arabic clothes, for more than 20 years, but he had limited resources which prevented him from meeting all the customers demands.

"I wanted to close my shop, but then my son told me that an NGO is supporting small business. So, we applied: and it was so easy, they brought us three beautiful, modern, silent sewing machines."

With the support of the EU Trust Fund and the German Government, Araz, his wife, his two sons and his daughter-in-law are now all working in his small shop.
